TERMS OF THE POST.

THE BOSTON POST is published every morning, at No. 21, Water Street, Boston, by CNARLES G. GREENE, at four dollars per annum, payable in advance; four dollars and fifty cents, if paid within six months, or five dollars at the end of the year. These conditions will be rigidly adhered to.

STENOGRAPHIC GLIMPSES OF CONGRESS.

Washington, Feb. 7, 1834 .- The President held a Drawing-room last night, the first of the season. The encounter of carriages in the court-yard, was like the onset of battle. They all strive to discharge their fare, and the fair, first. There was some crashing, and more screaming:

" And then and there, was hurrying to and fro."

There is something very thrilling and musical in a scream of alarm from a fair ladyespecially when there is no danger: but there was some danger here of soiled shoes—for some of the ladies, fearful and impatient, alighted before they arrived at the portico, to the imminent danger of saluting the earth, not always as dry as a toper, with their pretty little twinkling feet. But there was not a Cinderilla among them-and there were manywho lost her glass slipper; if they had, as soon as they had reached the presence chamber, they would have forgotten their loss in the rival charms, and beauty, and splendor, that surrounded them. The venerable Chief, OLD ORLEANS, towering in the midst, imparted and received a thousand heart-warm grasps of hands. It was transporting to witness the homage, so well deserved-the welcome so sincerely tendered, so warmly acknowledged, so gratefully reciprocated.

How shall I describe the scene? It was a living sea of animated billows! casting up its hidden treasures of pearl and coral, and gems and jewels-tossed by the winds, and glittering beneath the moonbeams! And yet the halcyon's nest floated calmly upon its bosom. Here the star of honor sparkled upon the breast of the Ambassador; there the golden epaulette glittered from the shoulder of the Officer; here the pearl wreath strove to rival the fairer brow—the ruby, a rubier lip—the diamond, a brighter eye; there the cornelian borrowed from a damask cheek, a deeper hue; the gossamer floated remains the gossamer floated rem the gossamer floated round a lighter form-the light plume nodded o'er a lighter heart! It was an oriental carnival without its maskseven the opposition could not mask their delight-political prejudice, like a Turkish supper, was left at the threshold; those who could not come themselves, for pouring over the deep "distresses" of their country, sent their fair representatives, their better halves, —their treasures, their fair daughters. Ladies are never in the opposition, when mirth and joy, and delight and festivity bear rule. They ask no sounder currency than happy hearts can coin for them; and no better rate of exchange, than that of hearts and hands at parwhich will soon raise them above pa'! and probably to ma! Heigho! in these cabinet councils of love, I fear they don't always ask their daddy's advice—do you think they do, Mr Duane? I only ask you—to give my opinion; so you need not sum up with a sermon or manifesto. To leave the sheep, and go back to the subject-

The order of the evening was constant motion, promenading the long, splendid, gor-geous, and much celebrated "East Room;" and constant conversation, introductions and salutations. The etiquette is, if married ladies, to take any arm but their husbands', after being presented; so that it would be more puzzling to tell who their husbands were, than to decide that case in scripture where the lady married three brothers; the damsels, if affianced, flirt with some Damons who are free; if they are not, they ogle some youth whose faith is plighted, and strive to rival his mistress with their charms; or perhaps take the arm of some sober husband, striving to excite in the bosom of the wife. dangling upon a bachelor's arm, that unquiet passion that "makes the meat it feeds on;" and causing her, like camelion,

"To look before, and after," with one eye upon her gallant, and the other

turned back upon her husband.

I'll be sworn, nobody saw such things but me. And why? I roamed with both arms free; and heart free too; nothing but eyes and ears, and, now and then at intervals, my tongue engaged.

It was a splendid scene! would I could paint it. It was a joyous scene! would I could dream of it-but some hag of Endor would strangle the vision. It was a happy scene! would I could garner it up in the heart-but it would soon fester there; or in the memory-but it would soon be lost and buried beneath the lumber of sad realities. As it is, I leave but a scroll of it, which the next idle wind will waft away to the realms of obliv-REIS EFFENDI.

THE MORNING POST.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1834.

STENOGRAPHIC GLIMPSES OF CONGRESS.

No. LX. Washington, Feb. 8, 1834 .- It is Saturdaynay, Saturday night; and I am glad of it. It has been a stormy week-politically; and not very fair, elementally; certainly it has been "time to try men's soles," and ladies' too. But it has past; and we shall not see it again many bright spots in it. I think we have had somewhat of a crisis for the week past-a crisis of ebulition on the part of the opposition. Mr Clay has ranted several times, till he became quite rabid; but he takes care to bite nobody present, though he snaps now and then at the Vice President. When he begins to exhibit the premonitory symptoms of hydrophobia -- which is only considered dangerous by the cold-water society here—a lad immediately brings him a tumbler of Adams' ale, and the Honorable Senator from Kentucky incontinently pops a lump of loaf sugar into it. It don't seem to sweeten his disposition at all, any more than so much gin-sling would. It is, nevertheless, very pleasant to hear his musical voice, whoever, or whatever, he may be talking about. Nobody suffers but himself; and nobody comes to his relief in his paroxysms; though when Mr Webster is taken ill, at any forgotten phrase, he is always ready, like a good Samaritan, with a dose of hartshorn, or an oil flask, to administer to his relief.

One cannot but remark, how habitually cool the Administration Senators keep; and how systematically hot, the opposition. I caught a most infernal cold, the only one I have had this winter, by placing myself improvidently one day this week, on a settee, just in rear of the opposition; and then leaving the Senate Chamber without cooling myself in the temperate atmosphere of our side. When I went out, it being rather misty weather, I sizzled like a loggerhead in a mug of flip, (do I spell it right? I have quite forgotten how it tastes were passed over once or twice, so that they did not come till the next day or twoand I came near being "laid on the table; much to my aversion in these times of "dis-

Well, as I was going to say, if I had not cotched cold, Mr Clay called up his Resolutions on "Cash Duties" on Thursday, I think;

"The road between this and Washington is and yesterday they called forth quite an animated debate. The tables were quite turned upon him; he wanted to relieve the poor importers; and quite forgot if they paid their duties, the money would be most likely to get into the hands of the poor tradesman, and mechanic, and laborer, through the discounts from the pet-banks!

A memorial was presented from some ward of the city of New York, and another from the interior, discoursing most piteously of "distress," and "pressure;" upon which Mr Clay made a speech, commencing with, he "rejoiced to hear such a voice from the peo-I always had a suspicion that the opposition rejoiced at the "voice of distress; but I did not think them silly enough openly to acknowledge and avow it. It is only the old "war, pestilence and famine" prayer, stereotyped

The Executive business still lingers before the Senate; but Mr Webster promised yesterday that it should be settled on Monday, if Judge Wilkins would give way for the nineteenth time, and conclude his speech on Tues-

The Appropriation Bill, I believe, is finally fixed, settled, determined, concluded, and finished; after being settled as I understood. The House, to-day, commenced its Saturday sessions; which will continue till they rise; the Senate next will follow suit; if the opposition are not so much engaged in acts of

He stands high at home as a man of talents-and high here in the confidence of to be the same as that of the last of the immortal signers of the Declaration of Independence. Surely the faith in which Charles Carrol lived and died, should not be a reproach to Mr Taney, nor an objection to Mr Kavenagh. A Catholic Charge may with great propriety be sent to a Catholic Court. This gentleman, I understand, was educated at Montreal-speaks several modern languages, and has travelled considerably in foreign countries. I suppose the opposition will hardly apply the rule they made in Gwinn's case, because Mr K. may be "nominated to an office out of his State. REIS EFFENDI.
